The intent of the Buoy 10 salmon challenge to encourage our participants to release WILD TULEs. Wild Tules are in trouble, and the harvest caps set to conserve them deeply constrain our access to the abundant stocks like the Upriver Brights, which are predicted to return at a record level. It is legal to retain a wild Tule, but we ask that you do your best to gently let them go. Sometimes, it can be tricky to identify a wild Tule, so if you bring in a wild Tule that looks a lot like a wild bright, this fish will be entered into the derby poundage. The call will be made by Weighmaster, Don Swartz and we all appreciate and accept Don's judgment in the spirit of doing what is best for the conservation of a weak stock. We are proud of your support of this effort!

Wild Tule identification: Wild Tules have an adipose fin. (Do not throw back hatchery Tules!) At Buoy 10, Tules can have a bright, or silver appearance, but they can also have more of a bronze color, as in the fish below. It is likely that the teeth will be developed and protruding since Tules are lower river spawners. Tules also frequently have prominent black spots on their backs. Additionally, as you look down at the back of a Tule it will have a more pointed back. There can also be the pink coloring you see on the dorsal fin below, although Upriver Bright Bucks can have pink there as well. Tule picture below:

Any participants who cut fish to check the color of the meat are automatically disqualified.

Upriver Bright (or Bonneville Bright, or other Brights): Brights tend to be more silver, or bright, in color. Many have a long journey before they spawn, and their teeth are not likely to be protruding. Looking down on the back of a Bright, their back is generally more rounded than a Tule. We thank you for your support in helping to avoid the weak stocks (Wild Tule) that are in the fishery in 2015. This year is the 3rd generation of returns from court-ordered spill and is predicted to be a record run. SPILL, BABY SPILL!
